Tareq Baconi 0:00

The question for me today is how do we think about this moment of genocide as a way of resuscitating our revolutionary legacy, of going back into our roots and bringing out a political project, a decolonial project, that's not about going back to the past because there's no going back, but it's rather about how do we think about decolonization and revolutionary politics today, in this day and age, thinking about all of these global challenges. And I think that's our most urgent task to date.

Yara Hawari 0:39

From Al Shabaka, the Palestinian Policy Network, I am Yara Hawari, and this is Rethinking Palestine.

Over the last year, Palestine has been irrevocably changed in ways that for many of us were once inconceivable. Since the beginning of the genocide, the Israeli regime has killed over 50,000 Palestinians in Gaza, an estimate provided by the Palestinian Ministry of Health, that includes over 6,000 unidentified bodies in the ministry's possession, an additional 10,000 assumed to be still buried under the rubble.

Devastatingly, some will never be retrieved. Meanwhile, a July 2024 article in the Lancet Medical Journal on the importance of accounting for Gaza's fatalities argued that a conservative estimate of total deaths in conflict scenarios equated to four indirect deaths per one direct death. By this calculation, Israel's genocide has likely resulted in the loss of over 250,000 Palestinian lives since October, 2023.

In addition, Gaza is now home to more than 42 million tons of rubble. These ruins include many people's destroyed homes, businesses, and essential public infrastructure. Relentless Israeli bombing has also released hundreds of thousands of tons of toxic dust into the air, with long lasting and deadly consequences.

Eighty percent of schools and universities have been damaged or destroyed. And for the first time since the Nakba, Palestinian children in Gaza did not begin school this year. Concurrently, the Israeli regime and its settler communities stole a record amount of land across the West Bank over the past 12 months.

This theft has been accompanied by increasing violence against Palestinian bodies. Over 700 have been killed, 5,000 injured and thousands more arrested, bringing the number of Palestinian political prisoners to nearly 10,000. Further north in Lebanon, the Israeli regime has expanded its assault and displaced over 1 million people in the space of days and killed over 1,800, including Hezbollah Secretary General Hassan Nasrallah.

Israeli bombardments have continued to target neighborhoods and Palestinian refugee camps from the sky, while colonial forces began a ground invasion in early October 2024. Joining me on this episode is Tareq Baconi, board president of Al Shabaka. We will be discussing one year on from the start of the genocide in Gaza and the acceleration of the Israeli settler colonial project in the rest of Palestine and beyond.

Tareq, thank you for joining me on this episode of Rethinking Palestine.

Tareq Baconi 3:07

Thank you for having me.

Yara Hawari 3:08

Tareq, in this introduction I took stock of the devastating material consequences on the ground and I said that Palestine has been irrevocably changed. What does that mean for you?

Tareq Baconi 3:21

Thank you for this question, Yara. For Palestinians, it's impossible to go back to October 6th. The genocide is the bloodiest year for Palestinians. We haven't had this number of Palestinians murdered, including in the Nakba. The devastation that you just outlined at the beginning of the episode is one that will inform everything today.

It will inform our politics, our thinking. It will inform how we wage the struggle. It will inform how we relate to our brothers and sisters in the Gaza Strip and where we go from here. There's no way for us today to think about what Palestinian liberation is without taking stock of the genocide that is still ongoing.

In many ways that thinking, it's already taking place and is already evolving, but it will really have to sort of shape our struggle once the ceasefire is achieved and after the killing stops, we're still very much in the act of witnessing this genocide and attempting to stop it. So in that way, the reality of the past year has irrevocably changed us as a Palestinians and as humans, and that will impact our struggle. But there's another bigger way in which this past year is sort of unprecedented in the way that it's shaped us or changed us. And that's in ways that are not only relevant to Palestine. It's changed the globe in the sense of showing the limitations of the post World War II international order.

In terms of demonstrating the hypocrisies and the racism of Western liberal democracies or so-called democracies. And it's completely shattered the illusion that we're living in a world of multilateral governance. It's highlighted how important it is for us as Palestinians and as allies, as people who are hoping for a more equitable world order, to really engage with some of the issues that have surfaced over the past year, the fact that we can witness a genocide on our phones and not only allow it to happen, but also face the narratives that it is, you know, self-defense or important, or a view Western liberal democracies sort of abet it and arm it.

I think it really brings up global questions to the fore. And I don't think there's a way for us to go back to October 6th, either in a Palestinian context or in a global one.

Yara Hawari 5:54

Tareq, I fully agree. And I want to unpack some of that further, but you know, as you were speaking, you said this has been the bloodiest year for Palestinians, including the year of the Nakba and every day it does seem that things are more and more horrific than the day before.

A lot of people are asking how on earth is that possible? How is it possible for Israeli soldiers to bomb time and time again, hospitals, to force doctors and medical workers at gunpoint to leave their patients, to shoot children in the head, to bomb schools, to destroy every aspect of life in Gaza.

Something that I've been thinking about a lot is this idea or this notion that Israel is unstoppable. And I think on the surface it does sometimes feel that way. It feels that way in the face of this brutality, this cruelty. You know, we have this rogue state violating international law, left, right and center, wreaking havoc across the region.

But I think that statement is untrue and it obscures the responsibility of others because in the reality, it can actually be stopped. There are countries that hold a significant amount of leverage over the Israeli regime. The US and Germany, just to name two, they could literally stop this. Or at least disrupt it.

That's why I think it's really important that we don't fall into that narrative trap. Because it also dismisses how we got here. It dismisses and disregards the decades long impunity that Israel has managed to achieve for itself and has managed to cultivate. And it also dismisses that there are very real mechanisms of accountability that can be used.

Tareq Baconi 7:48

I think that's absolutely right. I want to say several points in response to this. I mean, on the first point around the insanity of witnessing this level of killing and the disbelief or suspended in disbelief and indignation, how could they kill at this rate in this way without stopping?

I think it's really important for us to sort of also take Zionism out of its exceptional mold. I think that genocidal regimes in the past have murdered and have killed in ways that are horrifying and brutal. And what we're seeing today is a particularly egregious example of that because of the fact that we're witnessing it live on our screens and the sense of time in which the immediacy of it is happening in front of us.

That cracks the illusion that we might have sat in before October 7th, that had we known about these other genocides, maybe the world would have acted to stop it. And now we know that the world wouldn't have acted to stop them. Well, the reason I'm saying this is because this disbelief that we're in is also something that we need to sit in and we need to understand how Israel is able to do what it's doing.

I think the level of dehumanization has been so pervasive that I don't think they may think that they're killing humans in Gaza, I don't think they regard Palestinians as human. And I think that is what enables them to continue this level of statistic violence. There's no other way really to sort of think about some of the images that we've seen coming out of Gaza just this week.

The bombing of refugee camps, people being burnt alive. There's a sadism there that I think is driven by a complete internalization of their belief that Palestinians are not humans. It's not their reason. I'm sort of bringing this up because it relates to your point about whether Israel is stoppable or not.

Israel is absolutely stoppable. If there's anything that came out of October 7th, of Hamas's attack is to sort of shatter this idea that Israel is invincible. That as a military power that it can't be dismantled as an apartheid regime. It can't be challenged. I think we've seen not only through Hamas's attack, but from the reality that Israel would not have been able to wage this genocide without the US that Israel absolutely is a sector colony that has always been and continues to be dependent on empire, dependent on the foreign metropolises that allow it to do what it is doing.

Therefore, in that sense, it is stoppable. There are levers of power that can be used to arrest that kind of atrocities that Israel has been carrying out for a century, not Zionism for a century, Israel since 48, not just since October 7th.

The reason why it hasn't been stopped is because this dehumanization of Palestinians isn't limited to Israel. This is a Western dehumanization. Palestinians are not featuring, and I have to say not just Palestinians, Arabs do not feature in the thinking of liberal, so called liberal western states, right?

They believe that Israel is the banner of a civilizational project. They're fighting against barbarism. This has always been the underlying assumption or belief of Zionism, and it continues to be, truthfully, one that also informs America's engagement in the region and America's engagement specifically with Israel.

This dehumanization is not limited to Israel. It extends far beyond that. And so when we're thinking about is Israel stoppable, the answer is, of course it's stoppable, but there's no will to stop it because as far as countries like the US are concerned Israel is serving both their ideological and their strategic purposes.

Now, I think that that's completely misplaced, and I do think there's a divergence of interest, but I don't think the American administration have opened up to that.

Yara Hawari 11:51

Tareq, I think you're completely right, the Zionist project and the Israeli regime has completely dehumanized Palestinians.

There's no way that they could be doing what they're doing on such a massive scale and with such support from the Israeli public. I think some polling showed that like over 95 percent of the Israeli public supports the genocidal actions in Gaza. And I think there's the only way that could be doing this is with such mass dehumanization, which, as you rightly pointed out, extends beyond the Zionist regime, right?

It's been decades and decades of dehumanization of Palestinians and Arabs by the Western and beyond. And as you were speaking, I was thinking in particular because this is something that I have written on in particular the western media's role in this genocide and really what we're seeing and what's being highlighted over this year is that the groundwork and the foundations for this genocide were laid long ago through this consistent dehumanization and the western media, mainstream media, has a lot to answer for in this regard.

We've seen it by the way that the western media reports on the killing of Palestinians, how they consistently unchild Palestinian children, how they completely dismiss and delegitimize Palestinian voices. So I think there is a lot to be reckoned with there. And something else that I want to unpack, which you mentioned briefly, is the role of international law and its place in the Palestinian liberation struggle.

In the last two decades, significant segments of Palestine's civil society and the wider solidarity movement have placed international law at the center of their work. And you know, in part because this is a system which claims to uphold certain values, many values, which Palestinians also hold dear.

Also because of a process of NGO-ization following Oslo, Palestine civil society was in many ways forced to break ties with a more revolutionary politics, more revolutionary discourse, and adapt international law as the framework for their modus operandi. And I think for, myself included, the ongoing genocide in Gaza has had a profound impact on how the international legal regime is perceived.

The Israeli regime has systematically violated the provisions of the Geneva Conventions related to warfare and occupation. The International Court of Justice, the ICJ, one of the highest courts in the land, found the Israeli regime to be committing plausible acts of genocide.

Still, not only have the US and UK and others played down these international rulings, they've completely disregarded the violations and they've also blocked attempts to hold the Israeli regime accountable through the various legal channels.

I think that many people are inevitably making the comparison of the international response to Ukraine, Russia's invasion and been comparing it to how the international response has been to the literal genocide in Palestine. I think it's not only about a lack of implementation and political will, but also, the hegemonic bias, which holds certain lives more valuable than others within the international legal regime. I think it speaks to the very foundations of that regime and who it was set up for.

Tareq Baconi 15:54

We started this episode talking about the fact that after October 7 there's no going back, that we've been irrevocably changed, and they agree with that. We're living in a moment of rupture, a moment of paradigmatic rupture, where the paradigm we thought we were living in has been fundamentally changed. However, there are continuities.

What you're talking about, in terms of the limitations of international law, it's something that we have been aware of as Palestinians for many years now, if not decades. That this system of international law in its DNA has excused colonialism and has not dealt with indigenous rights or with reparations, or has not protected the rights of Palestinians minorities, that it is fundamentally this juror-based order, fundamentally colonialist still, and that we needed to engage with it.

This is Noura Erakat's work, we need to engage with it politically, we need to be able to deal with international law, not as this terrain that is going to give us well-deserved rights, but as something that we will have to struggle for politically. The thinking always was that we engage with international law opportunistically, strategically, in an instrumentalized way. However, after October 7th, and as you see, even before October 7th, after Ukraine, we now understand that this is far more challenging than we might have hoped before.

Also, in some ways, we now are living in a world where the mask is off. The emperor has no clothes. There's no way for Western powers now to talk about legality or rights or justice without many members of the so-called Global South laughing in their face. And this is not only October 7th. This is also Ukraine. This is also the Iraq war. This is also Kosovo.

This has a long history of the West co-opting international legal norms and using them in the service of their own hegemonic power. Now, I think in Israel's case specifically, we also have to be aware that Israel systematically created legal precedents over the years in order to be able to do what it is doing today.

Extrajudicial executions of Palestinians are illegal under international law. Now the media and most people think of them as targeted assassinations that paved the way for the Obama administration to carry out extrajudicial executions of Afghanis at a rate that was unprecedented. So the kind of erosion of international norms that has been allowed to happen by Israel and by the West is leading the way for us to live in a world where bombing pagers and phones in civilian areas indiscriminately is something that's celebrated as a security operation.

This doesn't come out of a vacuum. This is the premeditated, systematic erosion of rights and of legality and of the international norms that govern the world. Now, in Israel's case specifically, Israel today is a rogue state. It's a pariah state that's carrying out a genocide actively. It's documenting the genocide.

It's being proud about it and it's spilling it to other countries, to Lebanon and elsewhere in the region. Now, can you explain to me what international governance will look like after this genocide? What is to stop other rogue states from doing the same? What are the measures that we have to protect vulnerable populations and people against genocide or against this kind of impunity, this kind of sustainability in apartheid regimes?

I think this is something that is really pressing and urgent for us to grapple with again, not only for Palestine but on a global stage. And I think in this sense, Palestine becomes the path through which we need to think about decolonizing international law and revising this rules based order that has only served the powerful.

So you mentioned indigenous rights and sovereignty, and I think this is a really good example or lens in which to critically examine international law and its bias, not only towards nation state, but also like colonial ones in 2007, the UN adopted the Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous People, the UN DRIP.

Unfortunate name, but there we have it. And some people celebrated this. Importantly, it faced huge criticism from indigenous communities themselves who felt that it was not only limited, it had a very limited description of indigenous people, but also because it didn't make space for indigenous sovereignty.

The declaration stated that nothing in the declaration could be interpreted as encouraging any action that would dismember or impair the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent states. You know, so reading that, you can see how this is actually actively against the idea of decolonization and indigenous sovereignty.

So I think that's just one example which shows the inherent flaws in international law, the inherent biases towards settler colonial entities and nation states. And I think you also mentioned something really important in that intervention, and the reorientation towards the Global South and the sort of, I'm apprehensive to call it this, the rise of the Global South I think that's essentialist, but we all know that South Africa brought a genocide case against the Israeli regime at the ICJ the international court of justice and perhaps lesser known is the fact that that Namibia extended the legal battle and brought legal action against Germany for facilitating the genocide.

Even with the aforementioned skepticism on the international law front, I do think that these moves were symbolically at least significant. I think it did signal a challenge to Western hegemony and reinforce the notion of Global South solidarity. And I think it's something we have to think about and take action on in a very intentional and serious way, whilst also maintaining that healthy dose of skepticism.

I think it does require a shifting of energies and efforts. I think it requires moving away from prioritizing solidarity efforts with people in positions of supremacist power and moving instead towards collective power building with other colonized and marginalized communities.

So all of this is to say that there are significant, at least symbolically, significant moves being done within these spaces that are inherently problematic and some might even argue inherently set up to limit people of the Global South and people who are under settler colonial domination, but there are also other avenues with these actors that we can pursue and perhaps other avenues in which we should spend more time and energy.

Tareq Baconi 24:06

I agree with that. When we think about the Global South, we mustn't think of it as a monolith. Because obviously we're not in the time and arguably even back then in the time of the non aligned movement, there were huge divergences and diversity within that movement.

The Global South today is not a monolith. And I think engagement with it has to be thoughtful and strategic. The way that South Africa is dealing with Palestine looks very different than the way India is dealing with Palestine and is very different with how Brazil is dealing with Palestine. Each of these states obviously come with their own baggage and their own strategic and strategic priorities and their decision making. So I think that the way we engage with countries in the Global South has to be thoughtful.

At the same time, there is somewhat of a shared agenda in the sense that I think not only members of the Global South, but globally, we are interested in having a world order that is able to deal with the global crisis we're facing, for example, climate justice and climate change, right? So we need to be able to engage in real conversations around what does it mean for us to move beyond the idea of Western hegemony, beyond the idea of American unipolarity and towards multilateral governance.

those questions are questions that are at the forefront of most global style powers, even if they are not necessarily aligned with the question of Palestine. But this global question is one that we should all be actively engaged in. What's happening is that Western powers don't quite understand that this realignment is taking place, and they don't quite understand that America's role is no longer the world's policeman.

Arguably, it never was. Obviously, it was an empire that was destructive, but this sort of self understanding of America's rule as the world sort of policeman, we're not in that world anymore. And I think the West hasn't quite understood not only what you call the sort of the rise of the Global South, but also that their own empire and their own sort of America's desire for Western hegemony and unipolarity is the source of destabilization and destruction in many parts of the world.

I think we're sort of in the midst of that realignment. As I said, Palestine is central to that, but to your point about how do we engage in these questions in international law, you know, is there value? I think fundamentally the biggest challenge that Palestinians are facing today is that we are not yet at a place where we're able to engage with all of these questions strategically and politically.

I think the Palestinian movement is immense today. It's bigger than it has been for a long time. And I think we now have global support and grassroots power and allies and solidarities in ways that would have been unimaginable this time last year at the same time.

I think that we need to be more strategic in terms of how we push this popular power forward. How do we develop political power? How are we able to engage with questions of international law? With foreign policy towards Global South actors with questions that are global governance. These are strategic questions and not coincidentally by design, our leadership, our revolutionary leadership of the past of the sixties and seventies has been co opted and emptied of content and imprisoned and exiled and executed.

We need to rebuild that we're coming out of three, four decades of the narrowing out of our revolutionary potential as Palestinians, our institutional power to sort of carry out a decolonial agenda. And we need to rebuild that. And it's urgent that we rebuild that, because in the absence of that, I think foreign interests and certainly Western hegemony will try to reassert a paradigm that's certainly does not center Palestinians or Palestinian rights.

The question for me today is how do we think about this moment post October 7th, this moment of genocide? How do we think about it as a way of resuscitating our revolutionary legacy of going back into our roots and bringing out a political project, a decolonial project, that's not about going back to the past because there's no going back, but it's rather about how do we think about decolonization and revolutionary politics today in this day and age, thinking about all of these global challenges.

And I think that's our most urgent task today.

Yara Hawari 28:57

Tareq, I agree with you that I think thinking and unpacking what decolonization means for Palestinians is perhaps our most urgent task. I want to take us back a bit to what you were saying about grassroots mobilization, and I want to bring us a bit closer to home, to our region, the Eastern Mediterranean, the Middle East, whatever you want to call it, where we have seen massive mobilization and support for the Palestinian liberation struggle in particular in Jordan and Bahrain.

But in Jordan, we've seen consistent demonstrations over the last year that have brought thousands and thousands out. And of course, Jordan has a very sizable Palestinian refugee population.

I think over half of the population of Jordan is of Palestinian origin. And then, also in Bahrain, we've seen very large protests take place in support of Palestinians amidst the genocide. And at the same time, these protests have been met with brutal crackdowns and oppression in Bahrain, perhaps more so than in Jordan.

We've seen in other countries where arguably, the authoritarianism is much more oppressive, like Egypt, we have seen small protests as well there. And all of this sort of stands in direct contrast to the Arab regimes themselves, which of course, not all of them, but by and large have been complicit in the genocide through normalization, through active diplomatic and trade ties, even militarily coordinating.

I think what has spoken to me amidst all of this is yet again, how Palestine is serving that role as the linchpin of regional liberation, as it were, how the mobilization around Palestine inevitably always leads to critique and to rejection of domestic status quos. So in Bahrain, for example, someone said that the government is so fearful of its own people's just demands, it can't even stomach children protesting for other people's freedom, let alone their own.

This comes after a huge wave of arrests in Bahrain, including of children. And it brings me to thinking about the writing and the work of Alaa Abdulfattah a prominent writer and political prisoner in Egypt who once wrote that the roots of the Egyptian revolution lie the solidarity demonstrations with the second Intifada.

I think what's clear or becoming even more clear amidst massive regional normalization is that the Palestinian liberation struggle is not just about Palestine, it's actually about the liberation of the entire region, and perhaps that links quite nicely with this question about decolonization and the urgent need for conversations around that.

I think those conversations certainly have to happen in the Palestinian context in Palestinian spaces, but they also have to happen beyond, in particular in the region, considering the massive complicity of Arab regimes.

But what does decolonization of Palestine mean for the neighboring countries? Can decolonization of Palestine, can the liberation of Palestine happen whilst those regimes are still in place?

Tareq Baconi 32:48

I've always thought of Palestinian liberation as being inextricably linked with the region and with its Arab depth for various reasons. And I understand when you talk about these regimes, when you talk about their complicity in genocide, I think of most of these regimes as being part of the post colonial order in the sense that they are authoritarian after independence was declared, there's sort of authoritarian powers that rise and that are ingratiated into the Western sphere and that are are not necessarily serving their people, right?

They are Regimes that are oppressing their people. They're anti democratic, put Palestine aside, thinking about all of the basic measures of humanity, of good human life are severely lacking across the Middle East. That's the reason why in 2010, 2011, the revolutions erupted in various countries throughout that post colonial order, which is post colonial in the sense that independence had been gained, but neocolonial in the sense that these regimes are neither legitimate nor chosen by the people and are absolutely backed by foreign powers, those regimes are not representative of the Arab street, and they are and have in the past co opted the question of Palestine to further their own interests.

So that kind of dialectic, I think, where Palestine is instrumentalized or used in order to further oppression in these various countries is still one that we see today, even if we look at countries like Jordan or Egypt, they're dealing with Palestine in as far as they have to address their existential worries about what might happen if Israel expels Palestinians ethnically cleanses Palestinians out of historic Palestine, but it's not in any way acting more than that in terms of pushing solidarity or actively trying to engage in the quest for Palestinian liberation.

They each have their own domestic concerns. Some of them are existential and so the order that we're in is an order whereby both Palestinians and Arabs and non Arabs, just the inhabitants of that region, are living under settler colonialism and under authoritarianism. And both of these things are linked and reinforcing and mutually constitutive.

Now, If we think about this moment in time where Israel is expanding its genocide and starting to attack countries throughout the region, but systematically carrying out attacks across Lebanon in a way that I fear might destabilize the country and push us towards sectarian violence and the civil war in Lebanon.

What Israel is doing, and this is openly happening and being debated now back to your point about the media's complicity as Israel remaking the Middle East.

What's this? What's this idea that they have? This idea is that there would be regime change in Iran, you know, decapitating the head of the octopus, changing Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, Yemen, Egypt, in a way that furthers the Israeli agenda and strengthens the kind of relations that we saw in the Abraham Accords between the UAE and Saudi Arabia.

And Israel, this is a region where Israel is with the support of the US obviously financial and military and diplomatic rising as a regional power with countries that are essentially doing its bidding in terms of stabilizing the region and maintaining anti democratic norms. So it's reshaping the Middle East in its favor.

Now, this is a fantasy. This will never happen. We understand what regime change operations do. We understand that the arrogance and the idiocy of that kind of top down efforts to reshape and the racism to reshape regions, certainly in this case is to sort of meet Western demands, but this is the reality we're in.

This is what colonialism in the form of Zionism is doing in the region. This is the vision for what the new Middle East is. And so when we're thinking back to the point about decolonization. Yes. Thinking about decolonization in Palestine is part and parcel of thinking about decolonization in the region is thinking about how do these governments serve their people, not foreign interests.

What does it mean to have a life of dignity and of good employment and good health and good education in the region today, not in a way that's sort of giving up. Also, political aspirations are right to sovereignty and right to sort of having a political project. That's one's own.

I think we haven't figured out what that looks like in the region yet, because the forces against us are very powerful and to take us back to Alaa Abdulfattah's point in his book, one of the quotes that I love is he says, you know, someone asks him, what can we do in order to sort of show solidarity or support the struggle in Egypt?

He said, fight for democracy in your own country. And I think that's right. And I think the struggles in the Arab world are reinforcing the struggle in Palestine and vice versa. And I think that's how we should be thinking about decolonization in the region.
